To Coach or Not to Coach?

This summer, your rising high school junior or senior can live on campus, dive into a major and receive college admissions advising... all at one of the top research universities in the world.

About the cover artist: Doug Miller
The original artwork on this catalog cover marks the end of a prolific, 20-year career at UC Davis Extension for senior artist, Doug Miller. Retiring in May after two decades of service, Doug showcased his extensive graphic design talents on literally thousands of catalogs, brochures, ads, videos and other promotional materials. When asked what he plans to do next, Doug replied: “travel, improve my clarinet skills and possibly find a volunteer jazz radio DJ gig.”
While we can’t all be as talented and cool as Doug Miller, we can—and will—miss him dearly. Farewell, Doug, and thanks for sharing 20 wonderful years with us!

Student Spotlight: Juan Viña

“UC Davis Extension created an environment that allowed students to bond and work together.”
—Juan Viña, HSE manager and graduate of the Workplace Health and Safety Manager Certificate Program

Like many employees today, Juan Viña was accustomed to taking on extra responsibilities at work. But when his supervisor asked him to assume the role of safety manager for his job site, he felt he needed help getting up to speed on his new position. So he enrolled in UC Davis Extension’s Workplace Health and Safety Manager Certificate Program.

Why did you decide to pursue an education in health and safety?
I had a little bit of experience with workplace safety through my previous job, but when I joined the winery I work for now, I was hired as an operations training manager. Then my site director asked me to take on more responsibility, managing health, safety and environment (HSE) tasks at our site. But having no background in health and safety, I felt a little lost. I was doing a lot of research on my own, particularly on regulations, and I took a five-day course, but didn’t find it very useful because it wasn’t comprehensive enough. So, our company’s HSE director suggested I take some classes through UC Davis Extension, and things just went from there.

Since you were new to the health and safety field, what was one of the biggest challenges you faced as you went through the program?
The biggest challenge was just making the decision to develop myself. I had to stand back and say, “I need to be better. How can I do that?” But once I started going to the classes, I found that UC Davis Extension really created an environment that allowed students to bond and work together. It was interesting, because a lot of my classmates were coming to this from similar experiences—being new to health and safety and sort of thrust into this unfamiliar role. So, as we went through the program together, we would meet in person or Skype to ping ideas and issues off each other and see how others were dealing with similar situations, which was really helpful.

What was one of the most valuable things you got out of the program?
I’d have to say confidence. As a person who was given this responsibility without previous experience in the HSE field, I had opinions about how our site should run safely, but I didn’t have the background to know if these ideas were valid or not. The UC Davis Extension instructors and the bond I formed with my classmates, created an environment where I felt comfortable sharing my ideas and receiving feedback. And because of that open exchange of ideas, I know that some of the solutions and processes I implemented were not only validated, but, in some cases, adopted by others in my class at their companies, which was very rewarding for me personally.

Would you recommend the program to others?
Yes, in a heartbeat. I found that the courses were really well paced, which allowed me to not only digest the information, but take what I learned in class and implement it at my job. Most of the instructors have also been open to being a resource to students to ask questions, even after we’ve completed the program, which has been nice. I also found UC Davis Extension’s staff was really helpful in keeping me on track with my certificate. I always felt comfortable asking them for help when I needed it, and I found that they were receptive to any feedback I had on how to make the program better.

I’ve already suggested this program to someone else at my company who will eventually replace me as I progress in my career. UC Davis Extension is definitely one of the first places I recommend staff go to for training.

To Coach or Not to Coach?
Insights on the coaching profession from one of its leaders

Michelle Payne is a Master Certified Coach (MCC), which places her in the top one percent of the coaching profession. She works with executives world-wide, and she is also an instructor in the Professional Coaching for Life and Work Certificate Program at UC Davis Extension. This gives her a unique perspective on the coaching industry—a perspective she enjoys sharing with potential coaches.

Payne’s first piece of advice for anyone considering a career in coaching is simple:
“Research the industry, starting with the International Coach Federation (ICF) website. Then, have a few coaching sessions yourself.” Payne says understanding the coaching process, as well as what it’s like to be a client, is essential to deciding whether a career in coaching is right for you. Prospective coaching students should also connect with alumni from the program they want to attend.

“Interview them. Do your research,” she advises.

The Coaching Industry Today
Coaching as a profession has evolved and become a much more prevalent part of the personal and professional development landscape. Payne says people now have a much better idea of what coaching is about, namely development and personal growth.

“The coaching industry is wide open, and the opportunities are amazing,” she says.

In fact, according to a recent ICF Global Coaching Study, coaching clients increasingly hail from all walks of life, including management, business owners and those looking to achieve personal wellness.

But, with these incredible opportunities comes competition.

“If you’re going to become a coach, be the best,” Payne says. “Fully commit to learning, becoming part of the industry and giving the time and energy to becoming a subject matter expert. Jump in with both feet and go for it.”

She advises that new coaches who plan to work in private practice not only need to be trained as coaches but also understand the important aspects of running a business.

“I see new coaches come in, and they have a hard time marketing themselves. They need to learn these aspects of running a business, as well as how to be a great coach.”

External coaches (those who are self-employed) make up most of the market (79 percent, according to the ICF) and Payne sees that as another great opportunity in the coaching profession today.

“As an external coach, you really have the opportunity to define what you want to be,” she says.

Internal coaches (who work for public or private organizations) are finding a greater use of coaching as an employee-development tool.

“Internally, coaching is growing and growing,” she says. “There are so many organizations that have internal coach programs— including Google and others. They know it’s important for their executives and other employees to maintain their professional growth.”

No matter what type of coach someone wants to be, Payne notes that becoming a coach is ultimately a very personal decision.

“Some people are surprised at the level of intensity in a coach training program. It’s an emotional investment. Know what you’re doing it for. Know how it fits your personal goals.”
